Mechanisms of protein synthesis termination: the completion phase of poly(A) synthesis in isolated eucaryotic ribosomes. The essential question of whether eucaryotic ribosomes terminate active protein synthesis at poly(A) sites is still unresolved. Using ribosome-release factor-depleted rat liver ribosomes in an in vitro protein-synthesizing system, we demonstrate that the poly(A) addition step is followed by a period of ribosomal activity, during which ribosomal proteins and tRNAs can be recycled for a second round of poly(A) addition (reload phase). The ribosome activity observed after poly(A) addition is associated with peptidyltransferase activity (decreasing continuously through time) and a defined period of mRNA dissociation from polysomes. Peptidyltransferase activity is rapidly lost when poly(A) is removed from the ribosomes and almost immediately when tRNA (in excess) is removed from the ribosome. Poly(A) reloading, following peptidyl-tRNA binding, causes dissociation of a subset of the peptidyl-tRNA from the ribosomes. Dissociation of peptidyl-tRNA from ribosomes during reloading can also be achieved by increasing the magnesium concentration. An incomplete mRNA dissociation from the elongation complex in vivo may produce a similar reloading reaction. It appears that release factor activity is related to this mRNA dissociation phase in ribosomes. Ribosomes that are incompletely dissociated are effective at the reloading phase.
