Counter-Strike 1.6 - 2018 Clean STEAM RIP (Classic) Fitgirl Repack !LINK!

Version 2.0 of the Python OAuth 1.0a specification was published yesterday as defined in RFC 6749. The RFC's primary goal is to standardize the data model for OAuth token endpoints and to make them more reliable. The principal changes include more explicit constraints on the OAuth token data model and syntax, and a few changes to the process of obtaining and processing an OAuth token. First, the new specification explicitly defines the following constraints: Authentication works for any server or authorization server; it does not require an "authorization code" server type. Authentication works for any application or "resource owner" client; it does not require a trusted "resource owner" client. Authentication works for any application or "resource owner" client that can be redirected to another application or server. These constraints are typically unnecessary, but by making them explicit it's easier to understand their limitations. They were added for some of the reasons already mentioned in the introduction to RFC 6749. The new specification also mandates a new and slightly different data model for OAuth tokens. This is the result of the large number of new OAuth token endpoints that have been created in the past two years. The data model defines the information that must be included in an OAuth token endpoint. It establishes that the token data model can be based on a traditional HTTP "basic" authentication schema, but with one or more of the following changes: The token must be protected by HTTP "Basic" protection scheme. The user information should be an opaque string and should be different for different endpoints. The user information can be short-lived and is protected by a unique key that changes with every user request. The user's token-granting application-specific data must be protected by a key, which must change with every user request. The user information may be only partially protected; the remainder of the information is available to the endpoint so that it can verify that the token is from an authorized application or client. More complex user information could be used, but the key must be short-lived, be protected by a cryptographically strong function, and change with every request. There are some other features that were added based on feedback from the OAuth working group: OAuth redirects should work for any OAuth 1.0a provider, even if the redirect is to another instance of the same consumer.
