Good news that I was waiting for: there's even more! ;-).

Previously, Photoshop had the concept of first time buyers, which I believe means people who have never used the product will just purchase it. Well, it's time to expand that to a broader concept, any first time buyers. Meaning: It is easier for anyone to get started with a document compared to the previous first time buyer experience. These panels show a thumbnail and description of the cloud document file. There's a button to view the file in a new window. You can also view the file in the cloud preview pane below. There's a button to jump to the most recent save for review. You can also jump straight to a specific review, which is useful if you now out of order. With the Create panel, you can start a new document. It gives you a default resolution of 300dpi. This can be changed to 72dpi if you prefer a lower resolution. You can adjust the size of the canvas to fit your current viewport. The default is 72 pixels from the top edge of the canvas. New in the Canvas section is a panel that lets you create a new layer. You can even create a new layer in a raster image. I have not been able to create a vector layer from a raster file. You can create a layer by drawing a line on the canvas or cropping an image in Photoshop, if you have not already created layers. You can use the layer and commands to create a mask, for example. Once you've created a layer and a mask, you can use the layer to import an image. You can also import a range of pixels from the image. You can also change the layer's blending mode and opacity. An image can be imported, but if it's a raster image, it must be converted to use with the layer.
